Tips for Changing Your Career

Every person will probably change careers sometime in their life. In fact, the average person will change their careers five to seven times in their lifetime.

If you want to make a career change, you should consider the skills you have and the skills you will need to start a new career. Skills such as leadership, communication, organization, administration, and computer literacy will be helpful in any new job you will be considering.

After deciding what your new career will be, research online. Look for information about important people who have the same job, and follow them on social media. You will be able to watch their TED Talks, YouTube channels, and Twitter feeds. This way, you will be learning from them without spending any money.

Anna Johnson changed her career a few years ago. She explained, “I wasn’t going to change my career, but my employer had a job available in Hawaii. It was a different type of work than I was used to, but the company helped me get new qualifications.” Her advice for career changers? “Always be flexible. You never know when a new job will be coming your way.”

As with any journey, you will need a map. Your career journey won’t be any different. With a career map, you will be able to set goals and know what you need to achieve them. So, go ahead, start mapping, and start your career change journey!
